For some years I have thought that a paper on this subject would be interesting and possibly somewhat instructive, and because of the fact that during all this time I have never heard a paper on this subject read, and not because I feel that I can begin to do the subject justice I present this effort for your consideration and discussion. I feel and I have often felt that there are some points on which the profession, or at least members of the profession, are not quite entirely clear, or if others are clear that sometimes they have either overlooked them or have ignored them either intentionally or unintentionally. Ethics is denned by Webster as the science of human duty, and medical ethics as a particular system of rules and principles governing us in the practice of our profession. On looking for a definition to it in Dorland, I was surprised to find that he does not mention it at all, as though the profession did not need a definition, but would by its natural instincts either follow these principles, or ignore them, as best suited the individual interests or tastes. The Golden Rule as laid down by the Great Physician, if always followed, would be a safe guide, could we always know just what it is. Do unto others as you would have them do unto...
