Not illustrated. 1832 Excerpt: .in some line, as PK, converging toward the other ray, and meeting it in K, the focus. Had one ray diverged from the other, suppose in the line MP, it would, by being refracted toward its perpendicular LB, have been made either to diverge less, be parallel, or to converge. Let the line ID be produced to K; and if the ray had converged, so as to have deacribed the Une NBL, it would then have been coincident with its perpendicular, and have suffered no refraction. If it had proceeded with less convergency toward any point beyond L in the line IK, it would have been made to converge more by being refracted toward the perpendicular LB, which converges more than it; and had it proceeded with more convergency than BL, that is, toward any point between D and L, being refracted toward the perpendicular, it would have been made to converge less. And the contrary happens, when rays proceed out of a denser into a rarer medium, through a concave surface of the denser. For being now refracted from their respective perpendiculars, as they were before toward them, if they are parallel before refraction, they diverge afterward; if they diverge, their divergency is increased; if they converge in the direction of their perpendiculars, they suffer no refraction; if they converge less than their respective perpendiculars, they are to converge still less, to be parallel, or to diverge; if they converge more, their convergency is increased....
