From China, to Patagonia, and into the Alberta Badlands, award-winning science writer Wayne Grady traces the link between dinosaurs and birds . and considers the question : Is there life after extinction ? . It was a small dinosaur hardly the size of a magpie, and lay splayed out on the rock as thought it had been sunbathing on its back, when something big, a sauropod's foot, had flattened it like a Cretaceous roadkill . Its legs and wings spread, and a fan of feather impressions where its tail was, the skull at the end of its long neck was turned slightly to 3/4 profile, so that its big orbitals and toothless beak were presented for easy inspection . But was it a bird, or was it a dinosaur . or was it both ! . In 1996 a group of Chinese farmers discovered fossils unlike paleontologists had seen before unearthed form an ancient lake bed, they looked like small dinosaurs, but with marked difference : a thin aura of fibers outlined the skeleton, very much like feathers . To some, including Canadian paleontologist Phil Currie, this find confirmed a longstanding theory that dinosaurs did not in fact really become extinct; instead, they evolved into...
